from “Emissaries”

Some mornings when I’m reading early, no light yet but the table lamp, my left hand will run through scales along the spine of the open book.
My hands keep their own remembrance buried in fine grooves of flesh.
The fingers turn over ignitions, faucets, always attuned to their proper force, knuckles never breaking things unless my brain overpowers them.
They’ve discovered spectacular terrains, soft enclosures I can never enter again.
I send them ahead as scouts for survey, emissaries that flip the lights in every dark hallway of the future.
